MBS Recap: After Fed, Bonds Tune Out Into Weekend

For MBS Live members, this recap will largely be a rehash of the day's most recent update which pointed out a consolidative range in force over the past two days. Bond weakened just enough for a small amount of concern earlier today, but a friendly bounce let us know that traders had likely decided on the range for the rest of the day. Here was the chart from that update:

And here is a more zoomed in version showing us how the rest of the day has played out (through the 3pm close).

MBS and Treasury

	Price / Yield	Change
MBS UMBS 6.0	99.43	-0.62
10 YR Treasury	4.9860	+0.0952
30 YR Treasury	5.3557	+0.0737

Pricing as of: 11/10 5:59PM EST

Average Mortgage Rates

The takeaway here is that this week's FOMC events were good enough for token rally in bonds. It is nice to see, though it's still a "safe" move considering it doesn't take us officially back into the previous "post-Brexit" range that dominated most of July and August.

Next week is month/quarter-end--a more active time for bond trading, and one where we often see the effects of compulsory trades that must be made before the end of the month-quarter. This adds an element of complexity, as well as volume and liquidity to a market already tasked with deciding on its next move. It should be interesting.
