The Day Ahead: Thursday's ECB Announcement in Focus

This week, we'll finally get to see how much of an impact remains to be had for the European Central Bank (ECB) announcement. The ECB conducts their announcements on a schedule, just like the Fed. So in one sense, this is just another ECB announcement.

In another sense, however, this is the announcement that has been placed on a pedestal as the venue for the ECB to comment on the continuation of its bond-buying program. Market participants expected/feared some comment to that effect at the most recent meetings, but Draghi went out of his way to downplay such possibilities.

The ECB increasingly changed its tune in recent weeks and is now on the record as saying Thursday's meeting will address the continuation of the program (or lack thereof). Unofficially, we're told that the ECB has actively been brainstorming ways to break the bad news to markets that it won't be buying bonds forever. While that might seem like a no-brainer, markets nonetheless consider the confirmation to be a tradeable event--much like it was in mid-June 2013 with the Fed (the taper tantrum was already a ball in motion as of mid-May).

Traders have already done much to price in the likelihood of the unofficial rumors becoming reality. In other words, much of rate sell-off of mid-to-late 2016 is due to the growing concern of ECB tapering. The US election kicked the weakness into high gear, but over the past week, European bond markets lost ground at a quicker pace.

As markets digest this week's data, we can continue to watch same technical pivot points that have consistently been relevant post-election. These can be seen on the chart below (2.29, 2.35, 2.42). The overnight weakness (which brought yields back over 2.42) will be discussed in the AM update on MBS Live.
