Another Week, Another Trip to All-Time Lows For Mortgage Rates

Mortgage rates fell again today. Whereas yesterday's improvements arrived in choppy fashion only after many lenders quoted higher rates in the morning. Today's improvement was more conclusive and more consistent from lender to lender. While there were a handful of mid-day improvements in response to bond market strength, most lenders were at least as low as they'd ever been to start the day. Many lenders were decidedly lower, bringing the average top tier conventional 30yr fixed quote dangerously close to cracking below the 3.0% barrier.

If you're hearing about rates in the high 2% range, shaking your head, and scoffing, know that you are not alone. It continues to be the case that rate offerings vary quite a bit from lender to lender. They can also be vastly different for different scenarios. What may seem like a "top tier" scenario to one person due to their 800 credit score and sizeable equity is actually not that great due to some other aspect of the quote (a "cash-out" refinance as opposed to a "no-cash-out" refinance is a popular reason for this).

Scoffing or not, this is definitely the new reality for rates. If we consider that the outlook for economic growth and inflation are two key considerations for interest rates, it's not hard to accept that we could and should be at new all-time lows. The bigger question is how much lower can we and will we go? There's no way to answer that with certainty. What I can tell you is that lower rates are just as possible as any other outcome, but they're increasingly likely to find a sideways range at new all-time lows (or close to them) in order to work through the surge in refinance volume associated with such movement.
