Volatility Means What You See Is Not Necessarily What You Get

Every Thursday, Freddie Mac releases the most widely circulated survey of mortgage rates. It is relied upon not only in financial markets, but also by almost every major media outlet as the definitive source for keeping track of mortgage rate movement.

I've said in the past--and it continues to be true--that Freddie Mac's data is quite good. In fact, they send out exactly what they say they are going to send out week after week. The problem is that most of the major media outlets that pick up the story choose to ignore the fact that mortgage rates move every day--sometimes multiple times per day. As such, reducing a week's worth of mortgage rate movement to a single number can cause problems when things are more volatile.

Things are more volatile.

Interest rates began the year by following oil and stock prices quickly lower. The best day of the year for rates was February 11th, and by a wide margin. That happened to be a Thursday--a day that the Freddie Mac survey doesn't count. The two adjacent days also largely escape Freddie's methodology. The bottom line is that a lot of borrowers heard about low rate opportunities a week or two ago and are now seeing headlines saying mortgage rates have fallen to new long term lows only to find that today's rates are nowhere near as low as what they may have encountered earlier in the month.

This chart shows a daily log of average rates compared to the weekly readings from Freddie Mac and The Mortgage Bankers Association. Keep in mind that these numbers are averages that won't necessarily apply to every scenario. They are most useful for the trends they convey as opposed to the outright levels.

Are we still fairly close in the bigger picture? Definitely! But if borrowers go to their mortgage professionals expecting to lock rates from 2 weeks ago, it's a recipe for confusion and distrust. Fortunately, the explanation is hiding in plain sight and should help everyone get on the same page. To see for yourself, check this link where Freddie says "The survey is collected from Monday through Wednesday."

Market Recap

Bond markets continue taking most of their cues from the fluctuations in oil and stock prices. This is a break from historical norms where bonds (and thus, mortgage rates) have typically paid much more attention to economic data (the reports on various economic metrics that are released on a set schedule throughout the month).

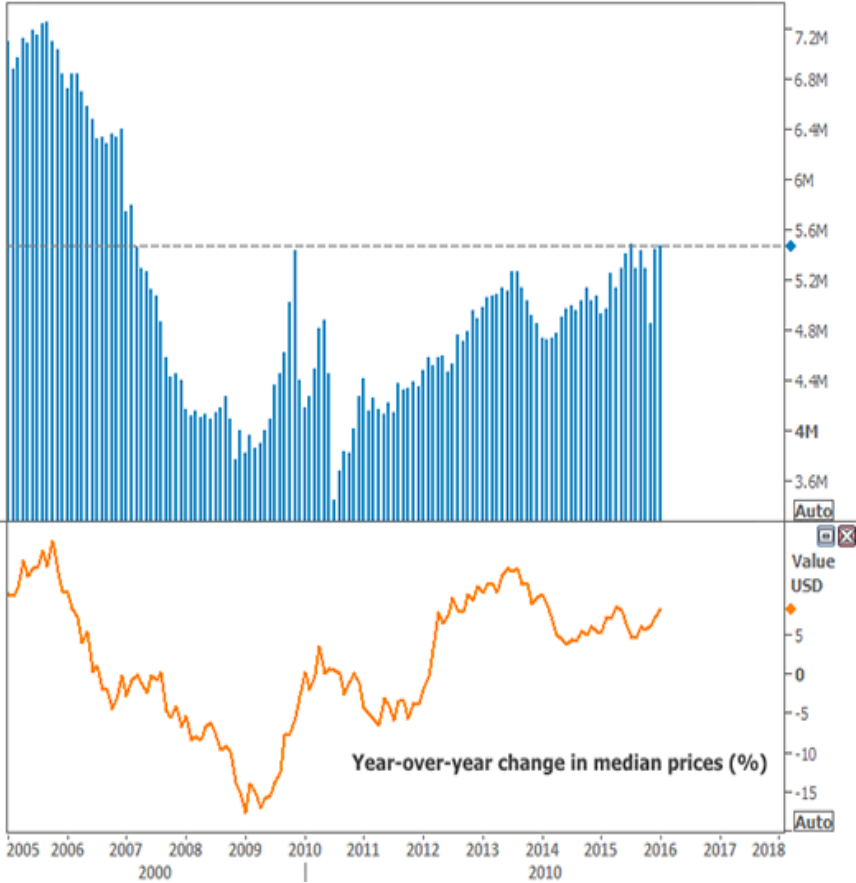

For instance, this week's Durable Goods data was much stronger than expected. At most points in the past, this would put pressure on rates to move higher. This time around, however, rates held near their lowest levels of the week. Simply put, bond markets are waiting to see if stocks and oil are really going to take a nose-dive, and look fairly content to hold the recent range until such a nose-dive can be ruled-out or confirmed.

In housing-specific news, foreclosures are still growing in nearly half of the country, according to RealtyTrac. And that's not simply a factor of lenders working through foreclosure pipelines. Black Knight released its "First Look" at January's mortgage data and noted that delinquency rates have increased to an 11-month high.

Case-Shiller home prices showed cooling appreciation rates in general although several metro areas are still experiencing double-digit year-over-year growth.

In terms of sales numbers, the Census Bureau's New Home Sales report painted a vastly different picture compared to The National Association of Realtors Existing Home Sales data. Whereas New home sales and median prices both slipped into negative year-over-year territory for the first time since mid-2014, Existing Home Sales were very close to 9-year highs and median prices appreciated at their fastest year-over-year pace since April 2015.

Update: Buyer Broker Agreement

After requests from real estate companies, a nonprofit consumer watchdog group the Consumer Federation of America has developed a list of factors to consider when creating a buyer contract in preparation for upcoming practice changes in the industry.

CFA released its "Proposed Criteria for Evaluating Home Buyer Contract Forms" on Tuesday. The 15 criteria focus on the contracts' form – whether the documents are readable and understandable – and content – whether they are fair to homebuyers.

- the document's expiration date (CFA recommends buyers asks for a three-month contract and never sign one longer than six months)
- the right to terminate the contract
- the disclosure that compensation is negotiable
- the broker's compensation clearly stated and that the buyer broker can't receive additional compensation for facilitating a sale
- that any additional fees, such as for showing a home, will be deducted from the broker's commission if there is a successful sale
- that the commission is due only if there is a successful closing
- that buyers have an obligation – for no longer than 60 days, CFA recommends – to pay a broker who earlier showed them a home they purchased after the contract ended
- seller concessions paid directly to buyers
- dual agency not pre-approved by the contract
- an explanation of how a broker treats different buyer clients interested in the same property
- that buyers should not be required to first go through mediation or arbitration if they have a complaint
