Lower Rates This Week. Is This New or Deja Vu?

Some news stories called out this week's mortgage rates as being the highest since last August, and while many of them came out only yesterday, this is really old news from last week.

Both the Mortgage Bankers Association (MBA) and Freddie Mac release weekly mortgage rate surveys on Wednesday and Thursday respectively. These well-regarded reports have been around so long that many news outlets continue treating them as the definitive word on weekly mortgage rate movement. But reality is more nuanced.

While the rate trends captured in each survey are broadly accurate over time, they tend to do a better job of providing a stale, weekly snapshot rather than the timely look at rates that most borrowers are interested in. Both reports take a trailing 5 day average and report it the following day.

When the rate market is experiencing a decent amount of back-and-forth volatility, that often results in headlines like "highest mortgage rates since August 2025" when, in fact, the week ended with the lowest rates since May 14th. In the chart below, simply follow the blue line for the more timely look at daily rate changes. Bottom line, the highest levels since August happened last week (as we reported at the time), and we've recovered nicely since then.

This week's improvement was primarily driven by the same thing that's been responsible for most of the volatility over the past 3 months: the Iran war. Starting on Monday (when U.S. markets were still closed for the holiday), news came out regarding The U.S. and Iran being close to agreeing on a one page framework for a memo of understanding that would end the war and begin a 60 day process of hashing out additional details for a permanent peace agreement.

If "memo" sounds familiar, that's because markets have been talking about it since early May (as we covered at at time). The underlying details of said memo don't appear to have changed much during that time. Instead, the market is responding to its sense of how close that memo is to being made official. It's not an oversimplification to say that every time a similar rumor/report hits the newswires, the more the market is willing to react.

Bottom line: yes, it is deja vu, but the market's sense of incremental progress is technically "something new."

A Lower Price or a Lower Rate? Don't Guess. Compare: 10-22-2026

What Every Agent Should Know:---

With mortgage rates challenging affordability and buyers hesitant to make decisions, sellers are increasingly willing to negotiate. But here's a question every REALTOR® should consider:---

Is your buyer better off negotiating a lower purchase price—or asking the seller to contribute toward a permanently lower interest rate?---

A price reduction lowers the mortgage balance, but the resulting monthly payment savings may be surprisingly small.---

Alternatively, a seller contribution toward a permanent interest-rate buydown could provide substantially greater monthly payment relief, even with a higher purchase price.---

But what if mortgage rates decline in the next 6, 12, or 24 months?---

That's the question nobody can answer with certainty.---

A buyer who negotiates a larger price reduction may benefit from a lower loan balance and potentially refinance if rates decline. A buyer who secures a permanently lower rate benefits immediately, without depending on future market conditions.---

Both strategies have merit. The right answer depends on the numbers, the buyer's financial priorities, and how long they expect to keep the mortgage.---

For listing agents, this creates another negotiating opportunity. A seller contribution toward financing costs may be more attractive to a payment-conscious buyer than another reduction in asking price.---

Before your buyer requests a price reduction—or your seller agrees to one—give me a call.---

Let's compare the alternatives. Sometimes the smartest negotiation isn't about the price. It's about how the transaction is structured.---
